Delaware Financial Questions & Answers

Q1: What is Delaware's individual income tax structure?

A: Delaware features a progressive individual income tax with six brackets ranging from 2.2% to 6.60% on taxable income over $60,000. It is graduated based on income thresholds.

Q2: Does Delaware impose a state sales tax?

A: No, Delaware does not levy a state or local general sales tax on consumers, making it a major regional shopping destination. However, the state imposes a gross receipts tax on businesses based on total seller revenue.

Q3: Why is Delaware considered an unique jurisdiction for corporate finance?

A: Delaware does not tax corporate shares held by non-residents and does not levy a corporate income tax on corporations that do not conduct business within the state, instead charging a highly structured annual franchise tax based on authorized shares.

Q4: How are property taxes structured in Delaware?

A: Property taxes are remarkably low and are levied strictly by counties, municipalities, and school districts. Assessments are often based on historically capped base-year values rather than current market valuations.

Q5: Are retirement pensions and social security taxable in Delaware?

A: Social Security benefits are entirely exempt from Delaware state income tax. Additionally, individuals aged 60 and older can exclude up to $12,500 of pension or retirement account distributions annually.
